EGYPT: President Sadat is renewing his campaign against those Egyptians out of step with his policies.

25X1

Sadat has expressed frustration over "domestic elements" working against his policies on several occasions, and he apparently views journalists and editors as among the worst offenders. A similar purge involving a high proportion of leftists occurred last month.

One of Sadat's purposes in purging journalists and tightening censorship apparently is to ensure himself freedom of maneuver in his current diplomatic probes. Sadat views his diplomatic campaign as a serious effort to test prospects for a political settlement of the Arab-Israeli impasse and is intolerant of any criticism of his efforts in this field.
